

Peter Tabash brings more than 30 years of leadership experience spanning military service, engineering, emergency management, and public service.

Throughout his career, he has led complex projects, managed multimillion-dollar programs, and worked collaboratively with government agencies, contractors, and community stakeholders to solve challenging problems.

Peter served as a U.S. Marine Corps officer and combat veteran before building a successful career as a mechanical engineer and emergency management professional. He holds an MBA from George Mason University and a Master's degree in Emergency & Disaster Management from Georgetown University.

His professional experience includes leading large engineering teams on infrastructure assessment projects, supporting FEMA disaster recovery operations across the country, and managing programs involving budgets, contracts, and regulatory compliance. He has also volunteered for over a decade with Team Rubicon, providing disaster relief to communities affected by hurricanes, floods, wildfires, and other natural disasters.

As a member of the community board, Peter is committed to transparency, fiscal responsibility, proactive planning, and open communication. He believes that strong neighborhoods are built through collaboration, accountability, and thoughtful stewardship of community resources.

His goal is to help ensure the community remains financially sound, well maintained, and an outstanding place for residents to live.
